4. Additional Data on Otohu

Discouragement of initiation ritual by the Anglican mission and the consequent weakening of the institution greatly hampered me in obtaining the additional data needed to clarify Williams' account. Unable to attend any ceremonies, I had to depend almost entirely on interviews. Most adults still own otohu. The men usually receive them at initiation, the women either at initiation or, quite often, at the time of marriage. In about half the cases the father was the donor; in most other cases it was the mother's brother. One man who had been elected a member of the Higaturu Local Government Council, was honoured with an otohu by his wife's father.

With regard to initiation ritual, the seclusion of boys is no longer practised and the period of seclusion for girls tends to be much shorter than in earlier days. It is, however, rarely shorter than three weeks and sometimes still lasts for some months. The influence of the mission is given as the reason for the changes. When I asked why the modern custom for girls differs from that for boys, I was told that if girls were not secluded and subjected to the full ritual, they would be unable to control their menstrual flow; they would contaminate the village and sicken.

Kogumbari often occurs on the occasion of Christian festivals such as Easter, when the girls, fully dressed up, are 'shown to the people' during a dance on the mission ground. The white missionaries are unaware of the significance of the event. It appears that two ceremonies (puberty seclusion and initiation) to which adolescent girls used to be subjected have been reduced to one, which takes place upon the commencement of menstruation. Otohu are bestowed either then or upon marriage.

Boys receive their otohu at ceremonies which have become known as 'birthday parties', one of which is fully described by Crocombe (1966). The whole ceremony, including the conferral of otohu, usually occurs in a single weekend or at Christmas and a drinking party is sometimes given to the people by the father of the initiand. I never managed to attend one of these occasions but suspect that in many villages the ritual still involves the appearance of embahi. I have knowledge of one instance in a village close to Sivepe in 1967.

I was able to obtain additional data, relevant to the puzzle of the nature of the otohu, on two main topics: the role of the mother's brother and the role of the aguma. According to Orokaiva ideal norms, as stated to Williams (1930: 187) and myself, the mother's brother (epe) is the proper relative to perform initiation. This rule, like all others, is frequently broken, but it is worthy of mention that if there is no epe available to officiate, there is absolutely no preference for finding a uterine kinsman as a substitute: any other male consanguine is considered suitable, and in fact a father or father's brother often officiates. When Orokaiva informants were asked why mothers' brothers have this special relationship with their nephews, I was always told it is due to the love between the mother and her brother, in other words the du relationship. It is definitely not due to any special bond with the matrilineage or maternal patrilineage.

Bestowal of the otohu is only one of a series of ritual benefits customarily provided by the epe. These benefits take the form of medicines (tivo). A man

796 The same pattern is found in the dancing which occurs nightly 177 before a major feast is held or before certain initiatory rites (like the kere) are concluded. These are now referred to as "practises," [535] even though they are undoubtedly ritual acts in their own right. It is also significant that the Orokaiva seasonal rites have been fitted in as part of the Christmas and Easter observances, apparently as an exotic appanedage, but in fact as a means of preserving traditional religious obligations, even though in a changed form.

659 The same service of two masters is sometimes seen in the secular sphere. People built lavatories, on official instructions, long before [514] they dared to use them (for fear of sorcery). At Kendata, an hour's [754] walk from Sivepe, I saw a village with new houses, built on the govern-[361] ment's instructions, but I was told nobody lived there except when there was a visit from the patrol officer. There are many such villages in the Managalasi district. Here, government instructions are being complied with but customary patterns have persisted. In Sivepe, not very much show needed to be put on for the patrol officer. The place was cleaned before he arrived, of course, but not significantly more so than happened every week.

123 It is true that certain things were concealed from me in Sivepe, but these fell largely into some simple and reasonable categories: secrets known only to initiated men, secrets known only to members of a family or of the Seho clan. It was not a practise of the people to pretend to adhere to a custom they had abandoned or to pretend to 881 have abandoned what they were still practising. In the early days of our stay, this did happen; it took some months before we discovered that girls were secluded upon their first menstruation and then ceremonially exhibited. We were told this custom no longer existed. But then, we had referred to the custom with reference to what Williams said about it; and in that form, perhaps, it was not or no longer practised [841] in Sivepe. Later, I was told that if the ceremony was not performed [783] girls could not control their menses; there would be no way of stemming the flow of blood and everything would be polluted. Thus, the ritual has persisted. Whether full-grown girls, completely naked, are carried through villages at the present time I very much doubt (via Williams, 1930: 207). I was told that these customs lasted until the second 534 world war and then were abandoned. But I found the word "abandoned" 782 always a dangerous one; the calling down of spirits with bullroarers 178 in preparation for a feast (viz. Williams) was also, according to Sivepe informants, an "abandoned" custom; yet it happened in both Inonda and Urarituru (a mile from Sasembata mission station) in 1967.
It was true that it had not been done in Sivepe for some time--not since the middle fifties--and that there was no immediate intention of doing it again. On the other hand, Sivepe knew the use of bullroarers as a means of calling down spirits which would them be present at a feast and give this feast magical potency. For the time being, Sivepe people evidently feel that this procedure is unnecessary for the achievement of their immediate ends but it is still part of the store of available possibilities should a need appear to arise.
